Albert Einstein is known to be one of the most brilliant scientists who studied and created theories (new ideas) on gravity, light, and more. His discoveries set the foundation for modern day physics. Television, door openers, and DVD players wouldn't have been invented without Einstein's contributions to science. Einstein was born in _____ in 1879 and he was named Maja. He was curious from an early age but did not do very well in school. He did not speak until the age of four. From four to the age of seven, Einstein repeated sentences over and over. Einstein didn't even begin reading until he was seven. Math riddles, playing the violin, and card games were his favorite hobbies as a kid. When his dad, the owner of an electronics company, gave him a compass, Einstein took a keen interest in science. He tried to understand why a compass worked. That compass led to his fascination with magnetism. Einstein wrote his first scientific paper in 1905. After graduation, he worked at a patent office in Bern, Switzerland and graduated with a degree in physics. In 1905, Einstein published five papers on the properties of light. Einstein proposed that light was made up of particles, called photons. Scientists didn't agree at the time. However, it was proven through physics and formal experiments. In 1921, he received a Nobel Prize in physics. In 1914, Einstein became a member of the Prussian Academy of Sciences. In 1915, he developed his theory of relativity. The theory explains that _____.
